

Vikas and Srijal studied in the same class. Both were good in studies, but their natures were opposite.

Vikas often stood first in the class. He believed he was smarter than others and dismissed his classmates' ideas as less important. Because of this nature, some students slowly began to avoid him.

Srijal, on the other hand, was calm, kind, and humble. He understood that practicing SSSSB values connects us to God and transforms us into wiser, more loving human beings. Day by day, qualities like helping, loving, giving, and forgiving grew in him. He treated the classmates equal.

One day, the school organized a speech contest on “When Is Education Successful?” Many students spoke about good results, diplomas, high salaries, positions, and business success etc.

When Srijal's turn came, he calmly said: “Education is not successful if it only fills the mind with information. True education helps us become better human beings. Knowledge without values can make us arrogant and selfish. Real education means becoming more honest, humble, loving, helpful, disciplined, and respectful.”

The whole class became silent. The teacher stood up, clapped, and said: “Education is truly successful when it shapes a person to be humble, loving, and a living example for others.”

At that moment, Vikas realized what was missing in his personality. He understood that knowledge alone is not enough. Only when we live by values in our daily life can we be called truly educated.

Question and heat-work: What does true education mean to you, and can you share examples from your own life where values like humility, kindness, or respect have been more important than just good grades?”
